

What a difference between the nature lover and the hunter. There is a primitive instinct in the man who likes to grip his gun and wander through the woods for a chance ^{to hear} (of hearing) the whirr of a grouse or quail. There are two kinds of hunters, those who get the joy of picking up the dead bird and slipping it into his hunting coat pocket, and the other who relly gets more joy out of ~~hunting~~ ^{stalking} instead of shooting. The killer likes to tell the tales as he sits by the fire in the evening taking off his wet boots, yarning about the brilliant shots he has made to the right and left. He thrills at the size of his bag. But The real thrill of a high class sportsman is the excitement of wandering along the fence rows in the expectation of the whirr of wings, the chance of quick action. ~~But~~ Looking at the dead creature is not the climax of the ~~in~~ hunt to him.

"Why should we shoot grouse or quail that are a part of our scenic values like a magnificent old pine by the road side?" says the naturalist or nature lover.

"When you raise a lovely brown leghorn and her family of chicks is almost a part of your family, how can you be brutal enough to chop off the head of a beautiful young rooster and slip him in the frying-pan?" responds the hunter.

"But in the advance of civilization, the growing number of enemies like cats, dogs, and innumerable feathered and furred predators, -added to this the hunter with modern gun equipment and aided by keen hunting dogs- how can your native grouse and quail survive? They can't. They are going down," returned the naturalist.

"Yes, but the key to the situation is to bring in the foreign birds like the Chink and the Hun. This will protect the natives when only they live in the closed season and ~~only~~ the foreigners can be shot. That's the aim of Game Commissions all over the country." ~~The license money that the hunter~~ on

"Yes, the license money of the hunter is spent ~~for foxes~~ on aliens and not Americans. Animal life from man to bird is about the same. If America is filled with Chinks and Japs and other productive foreigners, how long will America as a nation survive? In any form of life, whether plant, fish, bird, or mammal, it is the case of the survival of the fittest. America with its native species is more wonderful than any other nation. Should it be turned into China or Japan?" returns the naturalist.

"But the hunter must have game to shoot. There must be a reason for luring the businessman out of the city from a standpoint of health and recreation."

"Why should he not be educated more along the lines of real love for outdoor life than for the pure ~~instinct~~ of killing? ^{n't} Is there a greater need for education and scientific research, and the how and why of maintaining America in its original form? Is there ^{any} a greater need than for conservation of wildlife resources? The use of these for man's benefit, but not the mis-use or extermination is the real question. There is no truer fact in the existence of America for Americans than to handle land and water resources on the sustained yield basis. The success of any farm area is to kill a limited number, but maintain the proper breeding stock. All game resources must be governed according to conditions," affirmed the naturalist.

naturalists & rural model people shoot birds & animals to learn to shoot in war - know the gun this is shot or killing - know the laws nature - have a good nature to learn to have no war again

Houker the Moose - man in Minn.

New Yorker
Carnegie O. & K.
week -